The Soul of the Apostolate

Unless our life is one of intimacy with God and His Son Jesus, we cannot be His collaborators, docile instruments in His hands; unless we have an intense interior life, we cannot have the mind of Christ and be associated with His love and His work for the salvation of souls.

By means of prayer and the struggle against sin, by self-renunciation, and the practice of the virtues, the interior life progressively rids the soul of all that is defective, thus favoring in it the growth of grace and love, that is to say it vivifies the soul with divine life, since grace and love are a participation in the very life of God. It follows, therefore, that the more a soul cultivates the interior life, the nearer it will come to God, and having become like Him by grace and love, will be able to live in intimacy with Him, enjoy His friendship, penetrate His mysteries and participate in them. Who, then, will be better able to understand the great mystery of the Redemption and contribute his share to it, than one who by means of a fervent interior life, lives in intimate friendship with God?

The first degree of friendship with God, which consists in the absence of serious sin, does not suffice to fulfill the purposes of the apostolate. A deeper friendship is required, one which creates such uniformity of will, desire and affection that the apostle is enabled to act according to God's Heart; he is moved not by his own impulses, but by the impulse of grace, by God's will, and the inspirations of the Holy Spirit. It is a very significant fact that Jesus made His apostles live for three years in intimacy with Him, treating them like dear friends, before sending them out to convert the world: "I will not now call you servants...but I have called you friends." Friends, not only because He shared the treasures of His divine life with them, but also because He wanted them to be the collaborators, and in a certain sense, the successors of His mission as Redeemer.

Only if we are friends of God can we be apostles; God Himself invites us to this friendship, but we must correspond with God ever more intimate and richer in love.

Only friendship with God, and the charity which unites us to Him, can produce that supernatural strength which makes any form of the apostolate effective. The more a soul is united to God, the more it shares in the power of God Himself; and hence, its prayers, sacrifices, and works undertaken for the salvation of souls, are efficacious and attain their end. But where will an apostle obtain this love which, uniting him to God, gives him such power? Undoubtedly from God Himself: "The charity of God is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, who is given to us." In a single moment, the moment of our justification, God infused charity into us without any cooperation on our part, but He does not preserve this gift, much less increase it, unless we remain united to Him by living an interior life. The purpose of the struggle against our passions, the practice of the virtues, recollection, prayer, the practice of the presence of God, and frequent reception of the Sacraments, is to foster union with God and the growth of charity. The interior life is a secret hearth where a soul in contact with God is inflamed with His love, and precisely because it is inflamed and forged by love, it becomes a docile instrument which God can use to diffuse love into the hearts of others. Therefore, it is very important to recall frequently this great principle: the interior life is the soul of the apostolate. A deep interior life will generate intense love and intimate union with God, and, therefore, from it will spring a fruitful apostolate, a true sharing in Christ's work of saving souls.

God Arranges Everything For Our Good

All this is loving God truly, and with our whole heart. And this is what Jesus Christ meant when He said, "He that loves his life shall lose it; and he that loses his life for my sake shall find it in eternal life." Whoever loves God in this manner is quite certain — and certain with an infallible certainty — that everything that God wills or permits with regard to him will be for his good, and even for his greatest good. He will not see it at the moment, because it is essential that he should not see it, and the sacrifices he has to make would not be accomplished if he did see it, but he will see it at the proper time. He will admire the wisdom and the infinite goodness of God in the wonderful way in which He leads the souls who belong to Him entirely. And he will see with astonishment that the very things that he feared would be for his hopeless ruin are those that have made his salvation assured.

It is not difficult to understand on what foundation St. Paul based his maxim.

God alone has the right idea of what sanctity is; He alone knows, and He alone has at His disposal, the means that can lead us to it. He alone also knows what is in the secret depths of our souls, our sentiments, our natural character, and the obstacles that are to be found there against our sanctity. He alone knows what secret motives will move us and how to bring us to the end that He intends for our sanctification without in any way constraining our free will. He knows what effect such and such an event, such and such a temptation, or such and such a trial will produce on us; and on His part, all is prepared so that it may have good success.

God has loved us from all eternity. He loved us first, before we could love Him, and there is nothing in us that is good, either in the order of nature or of grace, that He has not given to us. He loves us with a love that is infinitely wise, infinitely enlightened. He loves us not so much with regard to this present life, which is only passing away, only a time of trial, but with regard to the future life, which is our destination and our final end.

If, then, it is true that everything that happens here to the servants of God is overruled and arranged by infinite Love and Wisdom for their eternal happiness, it can be only through their own fault if the designs of God are not fulfilled. And if a single event happens that does not conduce to their spiritual advantage, it is most certainly through their want of love and trust, and their failing in conformity to the will of God. For, as long as they love God with a real, effective, and practical love, it is impossible for anything in the world to keep them back; on the contrary, everything will help to their advancement in perfection and will contribute to it.
