Not Excusing Oneself

In any failure, fault, or personal error, our ego instinctively tries to excuse itself. It is the tactic of pride—which is not willing to admit its mistakes and schemes—to hide them under more or less false pretexts, always finding some way to blame them on other people or on circumstances. Adam and Eve acted in this way after their sin; it is also the instinct of anyone who commits a fault. Herein lies great danger for the soul, because it is impossible for us to correct our faults if we are not willing to acknowledge them. It requires great courage to tear down these ingenious but inconsistent constructions of self-love, to expose our failings and look them squarely in the face, just as they are, without blaming them on anyone but ourselves. “When we commit a fault,” said St. Thérèse of the Child Jesus, “we must not attribute it to a physical cause, such as illness or the weather, but we must attribute it to our own lack of perfection. . . . Occasions do not make man weak, but they do show what he is” (C).

Excusing our faults may satisfy our pride; but in reality, it is voluntarily blinding oneself and making oneself incapable of seeing the true situation. Thus our poor soul is not only unable to advance, but it is condemned to grope in the dark with no possibility of escape. On the other hand, if we sincerely recognize our faults, we have already taken the first step toward correcting them. Yet it is not enough to avoid excusing ourselves interiorly; we must also guard against exonerating ourselves before others. In other words, after acknowledging our failings before God, we must also confess them before men, accept a correction humbly, and repair the bad example we may have given. At the same time, it would be of little value to receive an accusation or a reproach silently, if the soul—even at the cost of great struggle and effort—did not also avoid excusing itself interiorly.

Rebukes very often annoy us because we think they are not entirely in proportion to our faults and failings. We do not realize that this is one of the inevitable consequences of human limitations; only God who reads our hearts can judge our acts with perfect justice. Men see but the exterior, and therefore, even when it is their duty to correct us, they do not always evaluate correctly, but may often make mistakes either by excess or by deficiency. If we are willing to accept only the observations which perfectly correspond to our faults, we will very often be in danger of making excuses, protesting, giving explanations, and if we cannot do this outwardly, we shall do it at least interiorly. Thus we will lose the benefit we could have derived from the corrections, had we received them with humility of heart. (Divine Intimacy Fr. Gabriel of St. Mary Magdalen)

From the Pastor

Are you promoting sex trafficking? You could very well be if you view online pornography. A recent article on sex trafficking found in the Knights of Columbus Columbia magazine states: “Videos of sex trafficked persons can be uploaded to mainstream pornography websites . . . While people assume everything they see in pornography is pure fantasy, anyone watching may be vicariously participating in, and even enjoying, another person’s living nightmare. Nobody who watches pornography can be certain that they have not watched trafficked persons’ abuse. Further, pornography creates and drives the demand for trafficked women and children.” Those who watch pornography not only risk destroying their own lives, but are helping to destroy the lives of others - one more reason why no one should ever view pornography! Besides putting one’s soul in jeopardy of being lost, pornography is addictive, it takes away one’s joy, it prevents one from forming and/or maintaining healthy relationships, it makes it impossible to have a truly happy marriage, religious vocations are destroyed. Those who have developed the vice of viewing pornography must do all they can to overcome it – even if it means giving up internet and TV access. Better to go to heaven without those things, than to go to hell with them. Everyone must be assiduous in protecting himself from pornography; as well as protecting those for whom he has responsibility. Parents must make sure that adequate controls are placed on all the electronic devices that their children have access to – computers, cell phones, video games, televisions. Pornography is ruining us as individuals and as nations. We must do what we can to ensure that pornography is banned – period! It is an intrinsic evil, which means it’s always wrong – 100% of the time. For those who wish to avoid getting caught in the snares of pornography, pray the Rosary. For those who are caught, pray the Rosary. If you’re already praying the Rosary daily, pray two Rosaries; if you’re praying two Rosaries, pray three! There’s no moral problem that cannot be overcome by the devout, persevering praying of the Rosary.
